CHAPTER I

On Man

1. Introductory
2. Portrait of Man in general—The Intellectual Man; his Faculties—The Moral Man—The Way to Truth in the Sciences; in Law and Politics—Merits and defects of Hobbes' account of man—His doctrine of the Physical and of the Mental Equality of men
3. Primitive Condition of Man in the State of Nature—The War of every man with every man: a Deduction from the Equality of Ability, and men's Passions—Confirmation of his Deduction from men's distrust of each other, and from what takes place in a Civil War, where there is a partial return to the State of Nature

CHAPTER II

On Commonwealths

1. The Various Laws of Nature summed up into one Universal Maxim (the Golden Rule of the Gospel put negatively)—Why ineffectual in the State of Nature—Small unions or temporary leagues will not avoid the evils of the State of Nature—The only means of escape from the State of Nature: The Original Social Covenant or Contract, the Origin of Commonwealths or Civil Society—The other Origin is Force, in two forms
2. Merits and Defects of this theory—Defects in his Psychology—Omission of the fact of Sociability—Erroneous History—Recent research does not reveal in primitive times a promiscuous war between Individuals, but Tribes—The alleged Covenant not supported by History
CONTENTS

3. Deduction of the Necessary Attributes or Marks of Sovereignty—Duty of Obedience to the Sovereign—The Covenant one-sided, as the Sovereign cannot be subject to any Check or Condition—Proof of this—the absurdity of the contrary view shown when the People is itself Sovereign—Other Attributes—the Sovereign can commit no Injustice; nor be subject to Punishment; has the right to govern Doctrines; to make Laws of Property; to command the Army; to choose Councillors, Ministers, Judges; and the Power to Reward and Punish ........................... 17

4. Great Importance of his Theory of the Sovereign Powers—Its Influence on later Political speculation and in History—How far Governments should possess these attributes—The two dangerous attributes—His view more true of Early times, in which the interest of the governing one and of the many was largely coincident—How far true in Hobbes' time in England—The struggle against Absolute Monarchy in the Seventeenth Century—How far Hobbes is "the Apologist of Despotism" ........................................... 20

5. Theory of the Diseases and Dissolution of Commonwealths—Enumeration of the Diseases and Infirmities—Importance of Hobbes' doctrine—His neglect of History—Historical Origin of most of evils signalised—How the real evil of a divided Sovereignty has been escaped in England—How we have escaped without "Dissolution"—Other "Diseases" ........................................... 26

6. Functions of the Sovereign: First, to furnish sound Political and Moral Teaching to its Subjects—The Ten Commandments (analogous to those in Exodus), containing the duties of the Subjects to the Sovereign, and of Subjects to each other—The People are capable of learning; but their Instruction depends finally on "the right Teaching of youth in the Universities," the true ultimate Fountains of political knowledge ........................................... 34

7. Other Functions of the Sovereign (or the State);—To secure Equal Justice, without partiality to the Great—To impose Equal Taxation—To provide Relief for the Destitute Poor, and Work for the Unemployed—In extreme cases to undertake compulsory State Emigration ........................................... 39

8. Functions of the Sovereign continued;—To make good Legislation—To duly Reward and Punish—To select good Councillors and Leaders in War ........................................... 41

9. Great Merits of the latter part of Hobbes' teaching—Anticipation of the Theory of Sovereignty of Bentham and Austin—and of their Analytical Method applied to the principal Legal Conceptions—Anticipation of the Sociologists of the present

CHAPTER I

On Civil Government

1. Locke’s account of Primitive Man—His difference from Hobbes—also from Maine—The State of Nature not necessarily the War of all with all—The three “Inconveniences” in “the State of Nature” which led to the Social Contract and the establishment of Civil Government—Necessary limitations of the Supreme Power, especially the Legislative | 50   |

2. Important consequences from Locke’s Theory—Substantial truth in Locke’s Theory of Limitations, whether under a Monarchy, an Aristocracy, or a Democracy | 58   |

3. Objections to Locke’s Political Doctrine—Not verified by History before his time—How some Constitutions made after his time have been the result of a Social Contract—Origin of Government according to the Historical School | 60   |

4. Rousseau’s Version of the Social Contract—The original Social Contract was bad for the Poor, and only favourable to the Rich—The proper Contract to guarantee the rights of the Poor—Results of this theory applied in France at the Revolution—Final Success in large measure of Rousseau’s Theory | 64   |

5. Final pronouncement on the doctrine of the Social Contract | 70   |

CHAPTER II

On Toleration

1. Locke’s Argument in favour of Toleration—The different ends of Government and Religion—Argument that the care of Souls does not belong to the Civil Magistrate or Prince—The necessary Qualifications of his view | 72   |

2. How far Toleration should extend—Locke’s General Rule—His three exceptions | 76   |

BURKE

CHAPTER I

Reflections on the French Revolution and the Fundamental Institutions of Society

1. Introductory—Previous Political writings | 88 |
2. Reflections on the French Revolution—Object of the work—Its general character—Merits and Defects—Contains, when taken with the Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs, a new Political Theory, and an answer to the doctrines of Rousseau | 91 |
3. The mistakes of the French Reformers and the ease of their task according to Burke—The state of France described—The cause was that "property did not govern" | 95 |
4. Criticism of his first group of "Reflections"—The French appealed to Natural Rights because they had nothing else to appeal to—Real difficulties of the Assembly—Real reason why Property did not govern at the Revolution—Burke's argument that Property rather than Ability should govern in a State—Its substantial Truth—Its Limits | 97 |
5. "The Rights of Man"—Attack on the Doctrine—His Theory of the Real Rights of Man—Examination of his theory—His disdain for "Political Metaphysics," into which yet he is obliged to descend—Imperfect treatment of the important question of Natural Rights | 103 |
6. The 5th and 6th October 1789—Lament for the Age of Chivalry—What Chivalry had done for Civilisation—Consequence of its decline and disappearance—Pessimistic Prophecy as regards the future of France | 111 |
7. Examination of his remarkable reflections on this subject—Historical Review—Attitude of the Church and Nobility to Learning—His Prophecy only true for the near future and for a short time—The Three Revolutions, Industrial, Political, and Religious, of the latter half of the eighteenth century | 114 |

Appeal from the New to the Old Whigs

1. The New Whigs (or "English Jacobins")—Burke's Examination of their Doctrine—Ideas on the Social Contract or Covenant—Can the People resume their Original Political Power, once they have "discharged themselves of it by Habitual Delegation"?—What constitutes the People?—His Theory of "a Natural Aristocracy".

2. Permanent Truth in Burke's Theory—Necessary Qualifications—The Aristocracy in France and in England at the time—Portion of Truth in the Doctrine of the Sovereign People—The "Political Sovereign" and the "Legal Sovereign"—How far their Wills coincide in our Present Government—Doctrine of Equality—Truth and falsehood in it—True defence of Inequality of Wealth—Have the Majority the Right to change the Government at pleasure?—The only safeguards against the abuse of Political Power by the Sovereign People.

3. Apprehended Danger to the Constitution from the discontent of the English Jacobins—Warnings as regards the Future—Great hereditary estates no protection, unless the Jacobinical doctrines are repressed—Eulogium on the British Constitution—How far the Dangers signalled were real ..... 156

4. Thoughts on French Affairs—New Estimate of the Revolution and its Causes—The various classes of English sympathisers—Lessons of the Revolution—Classes who were Actors in the Drama of the Revolution—His Conclusion respecting the same Classes in England—How far the Revolution was “the Revolt of the enterprising Talents of the country against Property”—The main aims and results of the Revolution ..... 158

5. Estimate of Burke's Political Philosophy as a whole—His essential Conservatism—His Disbelief in Progress, Political, Moral, or Religious—Effect of the Revolution on his mental balance—How far he checked the Revolutionary Spirit ..... 166

6. The Revolution postponed comes to England—Its slow and safe course hitherto ..... 170

BENTHAM

Works in General—His Theory of Morals

1. Introductory ..... 174

2. Bentham's Mental and Moral characteristics—His services as a Law Reformer and a Reformer of the Constitution—Maine's tribute to Bentham as a Law Reformer ..... 178

3. Fragment on Government—Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation—The predominant Moral Theories at the time—Theory of Natural Law and Intuitional Theories, like Butler's—Relation between these—His attempted refutation of these theories—Exposition of his theory—Disproportion of the Work, most of which relates to the mere classification of possible Offences ..... 181

4. Examination of his Moral Theory—Its inapplicability in the Sphere of Prudential Action—It takes away the distinction of Right and Wrong, if Conscience and Moral Sentiments be supposed absent—Also the Moral basis of Punishment ..... 190

5. His other theory that we should aim at the Happiness of the Greatest Number—Impracticability of this theory held alike by Bentham and Mill—How far we should aim at the
