PREFACE

THIS work was prepared as a part of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, in connection with the Department of Anthropology in Yale University. The effort was made to secure for it the merit which attaches to a scientific production, and in so far as this effort has been successful it is in large measure due to the scholarly atmosphere in which the work was done. It was also carried on under the auspices of the Carnegie Institution of Washington. To it I am deeply indebted for financial assistance, without which the work must have been much more limited in scope.

Inasmuch as the book is based almost wholly on personal investigation, I am aware that it is open to the inaccuracies which beset that kind of a study. I have selected my sources of information with the greatest care, and have taken pains to avoid making any positive statements unless I was myself convinced of the truth of them; yet there are undoubtedly errors due to faulty judgment. My hope is that on the whole my opinions and conclusions are not too widely at variance with those which a complete knowledge of all the facts would justify. The same causes have necessitated the frequent use of the first personal pronoun, which is undesirable but unavoidable.

In some cases I have felt compelled to suppress the exact identity of my informants, as their position and the nature of the information furnished by them have been such as to lead them to request expressly that their names should not be mentioned.
PREFACE

The meagerness of the bibliography is due to the fact that practically nothing has been written directly on the subject, outside of a few magazine articles, and it can serve for little else than incidental reference.

In an undertaking of this kind, I have put myself under obligation to a very large number of people. Men and women from every station of life, both Americans and Greeks, on both sides of the Atlantic, have put their time and their information freely at my disposal. To try to acknowledge even a few of these debts individually is out of the question. Let me briefly, but sincerely, express my deep gratitude to every one of the many by whose kind consideration the prosecution of the work was made possible.

I cannot forbear, however, to mention the names of a small number whose connection with the work has been such as to render my obligation to them quite distinct. Foremost among these is Professor Albert G. Keller, under whose personal guidance the work was carried on. In ways too numerous to mention, he has shown his interest in the undertaking, and his advice and inspiration have been invaluable. To Professor Walter F. Willcox, of the Carnegie Institution, I also feel a personal obligation for kindly interest, advice and encouragement. Three friends in Greece to whom I feel sincerely grateful for valuable assistance, and many kindnesses, are Consul-General George W. Horton in Athens (now of Saloniki), and Consul Edward Nathan (now of Mersine), and Vice-Consul H. J. Woodley in Patras.
