Missionary education in home and school

Diffendorfer Ralph E
Title: Missionary education in home and school

Author: Diffendorfer Ralph E

This is an exact replica of a book. The book reprint was manually improved by a team of professionals, as opposed to automatic/OCR processes used by some companies. However, the book may still have imperfections such as missing pages, poor pictures, errant marks, etc. that were a part of the original text. We appreciate your understanding of the imperfections which can not be improved, and hope you will enjoy reading this book.
MISSIONARY EDUCATION IN HOME AND SCHOOL

By RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER
Copyright, 1917, by
RALPH E. DIFFENDORFER

The Bible text used in this volume is taken from the American Standard Edition of the Revised Bible, copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons, and is used by permission.
TO MY WIFE
WHO LOVES AND UNDERSTANDS
A LITTLE CHILD
CONTENTS

INTRODUCTION: The Place of Missionary Education...... 7

PART I—PRINCIPLES

I. The Aims of Missionary Education.................. 15
II. The Significance and Cultivation of Friendliness. 41
III. The Awakening and Extension of Sympathy....... 65
IV. The Development of Helpfulness.................... 93
V. Learning How to Cooperate.......................... 113
VI. Stewardship and Generosity......................... 141
VII. Training in Loyalty to the Kingdom............... 175
VIII. The Sense of Justice and Honor.................... 207
IX. The Materials of Missionary Education............. 233
X. The Bible and Missionary Education............... 247

PART II—SPECIAL METHOD

XI. The Missionary Education of Children (Under Nine Years of Age).................. 265
XII. The Missionary Education of Girls and Boys (From Nine to Twelve Years of Age).... 283
XIII. The Missionary Education of Girls and Boys (About Thirteen to Sixteen Years of Age).... 297
XIV. The Missionary Education of Young People (Fifteen to Eighteen Years of Age)......... 317
XV. The Missionary Education of Young Men and Young Women (Eighteen to Twenty-Four Years of Age).................................................. 339
XVI. The Missionary Education of Adult Men and Women........................................... 369
XVII. Religious Education for the New Day.............. 389

INDEX......................................................... 401
INTRODUCTION

THE PLACE OF MISSIONARY EDUCATION

Some time ago the following letter was received from the director of an institute for the training of Sunday school teachers in one of our large cities:

"You will note that the Training Institute is solely for the purpose of religious education. The question of arranging to have missionary instruction included another year in the curriculum is for the Board of Managers and the Teacher Training and Graded Work Committee to decide."

In the mind of this Sunday school worker missionary education and religious education are thought of as two quite distinct processes. In general, this was the attitude of most religious workers ten years ago when the author began an investigation of the relation of missionary education to religious education, and especially its place in the home and the church school. This distinction between religious education and missionary education was so marked and so persistent as to make certain results inevitable. The mission boards recognized more and more that the maintenance of their work depended upon rearing a generation of Christian people in thorough sympathy with missionary work, and with full conviction that its expanding needs must be met thoroughly and efficiently. For many years these boards had been reaching down into the local church for the purpose of organizing special groups for training in missionary interest and for added support. Mission bands, junior missionary societies, girls' and boys' clubs with a missionary purpose, and voluntary mission study circles were organized wherever there were sympathetic leaders to assume the responsibility. Then the mission boards began to see that these special organizations reached only a small proportion of the children and youth in the churches. The local Sunday school was the most permanent organization in the church dealing with boys and girls. Cases were rare where it did not include within its membership practically all the children and youth in the parish. It was natural, on this account, that the mission boards should desire to interest the Sunday school in their work, and many attempts were made to break into the Sunday school organization.

The policies and the methods in missionary education ten years ago, arose out of this necessity. Missionary committees were organized in the Sunday school and special missionary Sundays were introduced into the calendar, at which time missionary programs and special missionary lessons were taught, sometimes by specially prepared teachers. The material used came from the mission boards, but rarely, if ever, had the indorsement of the general Sunday school leaders, secretaries, and editors. There was also the temptation to exploit the Sunday school for the purpose of raising money. Collecting devices of various sorts were offered for use, and appeals were made to classes and schools for the support of special objects in mission fields. Many conferences were held to discuss missionary giving in the Sunday school, and whether or not it would be right to take five minutes each Sunday or once a month, or substitute a missionary lesson for the review lesson once a quarter.

On the other hand, it was natural that the Sunday school leaders, not being in touch with the pressing needs of the mission boards, should oppose and in some cases resent these attempts to break in upon their schedule with a new program of study, giving, and service. These religious educators were providing Bible study in cycles of lessons known as the “Uniform Lesson System.” All the publications were devoted to the treatment of these lessons, and all the time of the local schools was spent upon their study and discussion. The funds collected in the local Sunday school in the regular offering were used largely for the purchase of the lesson papers and supplies for the school. As a rule, children were not given any instruction or training in the habits of systematic giving, or in relating their gifts to the work of the local church in its community, or to home and foreign missions. Sunday school teachers were trusting that the pupils themselves would apply the principles of the Bible to everyday life. They were hoping also that the pupils would relate their Sunday school teaching to the need for gifts of money and service. Those who were directing regularly the religious education of the churches did not regard missions as we think of it in this book as the main business of the church, and they made little or no attempt to create a generation of Christians who would so regard it.
INTRODUCTION

The effect of this situation upon the pupil and upon his conception of missions was logical. He looked upon an interest in missions as something special or optional, or something in addition to his religious thought and life. This conception was heightened by the efforts to organize mission bands and other missionary groups. Children were asked if they would join the mission band which was to meet some time through the week. These appeals were zealous and, in many cases, convincing, but, after all, it was optional with the children. To them it was something in addition to the regular requirements of religious education in the home and in the church school. The baneful effect of this procedure throughout the churches can hardly be overestimated. A delegate to a missionary summer conference went home to her Sunday school class of junior pupils with the resolve that she would change her whole point of view with reference to their religious training. She had learned in her Conference training course that the normal result of her teaching should be Christian conduct especially in all social relations. She felt also that these relationships would have increasing significance in the growing lives of her pupils, and finally comprehend community, national, and international interests, all of which should become Christian. Enthusiastic over her new ideals, she proposed to her class a course of lessons with related activities which the pupils soon discovered were missionary. Evidently, they were labeled. In a common quick response, those pupils reminded their teacher: “It is not your business to teach missions. Mr. A. does that on the first Sunday of the month!” This