THE writer of the following pages does not deem it necessary to preface this attempt to pourtray the character and depict the life of a pious and faithful Clergyman, with any laboured defence of religious biography. The constant and increased demand for works of this class sufficiently attests the general feeling on the subject; and, coupled with the writer's belief that few men have been more eminently useful in the advancement of religion within the last forty years than Mr. Roe, must plead his apology for presenting himself and his work before the public.

He cannot, however, omit to state for the information of those who may favour him with a perusal, from what sources he has derived the matter which they will find in the following pages.

From a very early age, Mr. Roe was remarkably fond both of preserving the letters of his correspondents and of committing his own thoughts to paper. A book of letters which he received from various friends while in college, as well as several loose letters of the same date,
